Only after its author shall have gone upon the witness-stand and submitted to a searching cross-examination will it be entitled to any considerable weight.

The antics of Mr. Wilber recall the old story of the death of Richard Baxter. That eminent theologian, after a life of continuous sectarian warfare, lay upon his dying bed, when he was visited by several leaders of one faction in the druggist for it. If he has it not on sale show him this to be his final confession of faith and published them in a pamphlet entitled "Last Words of Richard Baxter." But a rival faction gained necess to the sick-room, by skilful questioning extracted another statement, waited till the breath had positively left the old man's body, and then published a pamphlet on their side entitled "More Last Words of Richard Baxter." There are doubtless a good many religious controversialists to-day who would be puzzled to know which pamphlet actually contained a summary of the faith in which Richard Baxter
